Exterior walls are exposed to weather and/or moisture conditions for significant periods of time during which time paint or other protective materials are placed on the walls for protection. Typically, exterior walls are painted during the fall of the year. If the exterior wall is of a type which is subject to consistent exposure to moisture during the spring and summer months, for example, siding boards, panels or the like, are secured to the exterior of the wall and are painted over. Since the exterior wall is exposed to moisture, it has been found desirable to provide a means for maintaining a prescribed temperature at the exterior wall for a period of time to permit curing of the paint or other protective coating applied to the exterior wall and over the siding. It has been found advantageous to provide a heat conducting arrangement about the edge of the siding in order to maintain a predetermined temperature at the wall surface surrounding the siding. It is highly desirable to maintain a temperature on the exterior of the wall at a point for a predetermined period of time to permit curing of paint or other protective coating applied to the exterior wall and over the siding. However, maintaining an appropriate temperature about the exterior of the wall for a predetermined period of time is difficult to accomplish. Typically, it has been common to place cooling devices, such as fans, about the exterior wall to provide a cooling medium. In some installations, cooling devices are secured directly to the exterior wall. However, such arrangements are not entirely effective since it is often difficult to effectively direct the cooling medium to the
