For allThe invention relates to a trifold clipper including a relatively permanent fastener to fixedly connect a first or top panel, a second or intermediate panel and a third or bottom panel to one another. With trifold clippers of this type, it is necessary to use a relatively difficult to break fastener. The fastener must not only withstand the forces involved in positioning and clamping the panels to one another, it must also resist the forces associated with separating and opening the clipper. The fastener must also be designed to allow removal of the top panel without pulling the intermediate panel or the bottom panel from the fastener. Typically, the fastener is constructed of metal with a plurality of overlapping buttress areas that are formed by overlapping and/or nesting portions of the metal. To resist the forces involved, the buttress areas have a relatively high cross-sectional area. To provide a fastener that allows easy removal of the top panel, prior art clippers employ a relatively weak fastener that is not designed to provide a continuous path for the removal of the panel. Instead, the fastener is provided by a relatively weak snap action that is operable between open and closed positions. The fastener is designed to provide for easy removal of the top panel and to withstand the forces generated during opening and closing of the clipper. During opening, the fastener moves from the open position to the closed position. During closing, the fastener is compressed such that it quickly snaps from the open position to the closed position. The fastener thus has two ends that are preferably oppositely disposed to one another. When the clipper is opened, the ends of the fastener move towards one another and snap into each other to clamp the panels of the clipper to one another. To actuate the fastener for opening and closing, a handle is positioned on the top panel. To move the fastener between the open position and closed position, the handle is compressed between the top panel and the bottom panel. The panels sandwich the handle therebetween and limit the movement of the handle. When the handle is compressed between the panels, a portion of the handle is forced into the
